Vertigo (1961)

2019 already? Makes one feel a little dizzy, perhaps. This celebrated film from Alfred Hitchcock contains some of the most iconic scenes filmed in San Francisco, and this wild suspense-thriller starring James Stewart and Kim Novak will help elevate the New Year. Don't look down!

Nob Hill (1945)

Nob Hill features George Raft as a saloon-owner who is just successful enough to rub elbows with the "old rich" on the posh Nob Hill. What happens if they rub each other's shoulders? We see that the point of view at the bottom of the hill differs from that at the top, and a young immigrant girl sees it all quite differently.

Prepare for Valentine's Day with this often-overlooked musical and colorful gem!

The House on Telegraph Hill (1951)

San Francisco is a city built on many hills, and the winding street views in this fascinating film serve this unusual noir drama well. Starring Valentina Cortese as a concentration camp survivor emigrating under an assumed identity, this haunting crime-thriller will give you pause.

The film won the Academy Award for Best Art Direction. See why!

Welcome, Danger! (1929)

Pass the comedy, please, this April Fool's week. This film was released in two versions—as both a silent film and a "talkie." We'll watch the talkie, imagining what it was in 1929 to "Hear Harold Lloyd Talk for the First Time!" as the film's poster proclaimed. Harold's a botanist-turned-crime consultant who finds himself smack-dab in the middle of the Tong War in Chinatown. Go figure!

San Francisco (1936)

The top-grossing film of 1936, MGM's San Francisco offered audiences a charismatic cast, a rough-and-tumble story, an iconic song, and put it all in perspective with its memorable final scenes. Nothing comes easy for these San Franciscans, and stars Clark Gable, Jeannette MacDonald, and Spencer Tracy all offer memorable performances. Come vote for June's film (ballots provided)
